DHS to use federal procurement to further reduce risks to the supply chain
October 15, 2018 | Jason Miller

The Homeland Security Department's initiatives over the past year to address supply chain risks aren't even close to hitting a crescendo. But the pace and volume of the drumbeat is distinctly mounting.

If the efforts to ban Kaspersky Lab, ZTE and Huawei products were just the prelude to the symphony, then the National Risk Management Center's initial sprint topics, the business due diligence request for information and the latest effort to use the power of federal procurement are the opening sonata.

"DHS's National Protection and Programs Directorate has between 8 and 10 areas of focus around supply chain risk in 2018. In 2019, we already know it will have no less than 15 different areas focus on supply chain risk management," said Jennifer Bisceglie, president and CEO of Interos Solutions, which provides risk assessment services. "There is a growing awareness and understanding to this issue. Our biggest challenge today is not having a national strategy around it while other countries do. Until we have a national strategy, you will have pop up policies or programs or studies, like the one from MITRE. The time is beyond here to have a national strategy."

Section 809 News

Fellow readers: this is my last week working for the Section 809 Panel. I have accepted a position with the Federal Aviation Administration. No worries though- the Daily Media Clips will continue! I want to thank you all for your continued readership and positive compliments on this daily newsletter. It has been a real pleasure to work for the Section 809 Panel. – Katie Cook
