It is America's Move in its Competition with China
June 18, 2018 | Aaron Friedberg

In Washington and the capitals of many other advanced industrial democracies, there appears to be a growing consensus that prevailing policies towards China have failed and that some kind of alternative approach to dealing with that country is now urgently required. In a recent, widely read article in Foreign Affairs two former Obama administration officials conclude that, after years of "hopeful thinking" about China's future, the United States finds itself confronting "its most dynamic and formidable competitor in modern history."

Sen. Marco Rubio (R-FL) describes the challenge in similar terms, noting that in the 240 years since its founding the United States has never before "faced an adversary of this scale, scope, and capacity." "Decades of optimism about China's rise have been discarded," declares The Economist. "We got China wrong," writes an editorialist for the Washington Post. "Now what?"

The answer is by no means obvious. While there may be increasingly widespread agreement about the existence of certain troubling symptoms, there is much less regarding a diagnosis of underlying causes, and virtually none at all on the appropriate prescription. Despite the evident severity of the challenge, the debate on how to respond remains nascent and fragmentary.
