This week, while House lawmakers hold a public debate on the chamber floor over dozens of lingering issues with the annual defense authorization bill, the Senate Armed Services Committee will stick to their tradition of marking up their draft in secrecy.

For the second year in a row, none of the seven subcommittee mark ups nor the full committee debate on the massive defense budget policy measure will be open to the public.

The House Armed Services Committee holds all of their authorization business in the open, but committee members have said the secret setting allows them to have uninterrupted, in-depth debates on the pending military issues.

Meanwhile, House Rules Committee officials on Monday and Tuesday will decide how many of the 500-plus amendments to their draft of the authorization bill will be considered during floor debate later in the week. Both the House and the Senate committee are expected to finish their work on the measures by Friday.
