F-35 deliveries resume as Pentagon and Lockheed clear up financial disagreement
May 7, 2018 | Valerie Insinna

The Pentagon is now accepting deliveries of the F-35 joint strike fighter again, after resolving a disagreement with Lockheed Martin over who should pay to fix a couple hundred jets, the company confirmed Monday.

However, it's still unknown who will ultimately be left with the repair bill.

Spokesmen from Lockheed and the F-35 Joint Program Office declined to comment on whether the company or government will be held financially responsible for the production escape. The decision to resume deliveries was first reported by Reuters.

On April 11, the Defense Department confirmed that it had stopped accepting some F-35 deliveries on March 28. The problem, sources said then, is that the department and Lockheed had agreed upon a plan to repair about 200 jets that were impacted by a quality lapse — but not who should be pay for it.
