DoD faces new series of legislative provisions showing misgivings about JEDI contract
June 8, 2018 | Jared Serbu

Two influential Congressional committees weighed in this week with separate legislative provisions that aim to influence the Defense Department's adoption of cloud computing. Among them are making cloud service spending more transparent, and conducting what lawmakers believe are necessary "enabling" steps before diving into the world of commercial cloud.

The provisions – one each in the House's annual Defense appropriations bill and the Senate's Defense policy bill – were the latest sign that some lawmakers are uncomfortable with DoD's current approach to its upcoming JEDI contract. That is despite any shared enthusiasm for Pentagon officials' adoption of cloud technologies.

The Senate bill, approved by the chamber's armed services committee last month by a vote of 25-2 and released publicly this week, includes language requiring DoD to lay more technological groundwork within its own networks. The agency is preparing to transition key IT systems from government-operated infrastructure to off-site cloud hosts.
