Air Force's experimental way of training pilots finishes first iteration, but it may be a while before it sees results

July 26, 2018 | Scott Maucione

Imagine a collective mind of all the pilots in history guiding you through your flight training in the Air Force. The idea isn't as far-fetched as it may sound. The Air Force is finishing up its first 15-month long Pilot Training Next program in Austin. The goal of the program is to give pilots their own flight simulators to practice in whenever they want. As the pilots practice, the simulator takes their biometric measures — where their eyes go, what their heart rate is and much more.

The Air Force plans to aggregate that data and use it to help pilots train in the future. Using biometrics to see what flight aspects stress them the most and figuring out how to get a pilot through that hurdle. The pilots also get much more practice in state-of-the-art simulators that help prepare them for real-life flight.

And the Air Force says it's working.

"It's actually amazing what I've seen," said Capt. John Goern, Pilot Training Next instructor, in an interview with Federal News Radio. "A traditional ride in a T-6 for a student in a traditional pilot training base looks like the instructor flying about 95 percent of it, the student maybe flying about 5 percent of it when they are not making gross mistakes. Here, when I took a student up for their very first ride, they're doing competencies well into the middle of [a traditional] program and they're flying about 90 percent of the sortie, while I'm just trying to demo the 10 percent."
