Berteau said the Defense Security Service outlined the initiative like this: contract deliverables must be provided in a state that is uncompromised by hacking, the inappropriate sharing of data, or contamination of the data.

During a June 21 hearing of the House Armed Services Committee, Anthony Schinella, national intelligence officer for military issues at the Office of the Director of National Intelligence, framed it as the new fourth pillar of contracting. This hearing was when DoD first proposed the initiative, Berteau said.

"We must have confidence that industry is delivering capabilities, technologies and weapon systems that are uncompromised by our adversaries, secure from cradle to grave," Schinella said. "It is no longer sufficient to only consider cost, schedule and performance when acquiring defense capabilities. We must establish security as a fourth pillar in defense acquisition and, also, create incentives for industry to embrace security, not as a cost burden, but as a major factor in their competitiveness for U.S. government business."
