Is DoD is hurting itself with lack of cloud roadmap?
August 30, 2018 | Scott Maucione

"Because DoD doesn't have a roadmap, or at least they haven't published one, about how they are going to get there, its animated all the anxieties about what is going to be the future of this market," Schneider said. "Is it going to be served forever by a single-source incumbent like anchor chains where we have one incumbent that makes anchor chains and they've been doing it for decades or is this going to replicate the commercial model? DoD says they want to take advantage of the commercial model, but the absence of a roadmap has made it difficult to persuade the Hill, who tend to be the biggest advocates for competitive sourcing."

Schneider said DoD needs some way to express where it's headed, much in the way former Director of National Intelligence James Clapper did when laying out ICITE.

The intelligence community was "pretty clear as to where it wanted to go, but DoD has not gotten there yet in terms of explaining where it's going," Schneider said.

That is clear in the MilCloud contract as DISA works to migrate to MilCloud 2.0 and shutdown 1.0 by late next year, as DoD does its own procurement for JEDI.
