The U.S. Army is looking to change its promotion and personnel management system inside its acquisition workforce to create more continuity for its programs, the head of the brand-new Army Futures Command said Wednesday at the second annual Defense News Conference.

Gen. John Murray told attendees that the Army needs to rethink how it promotes individuals in acquisition, and that the way the service finds and promotes talent for its units in the field may not be best for business operations.

The Army must look into extending how long people are associated with any given buying project, Murray said, something supporters argue will increase project ownership and accountability.
