22 ways OMB wants to modernize how agencies buy, use cloud services
September 25, 2018 | Jason Miller

When it comes to cloud computing, the Office of Management and Budget wants agencies to be smart rather than first.

After eight years, OMB is changing the way agencies implement cloud services.

"We are not changing the commitment to cloud first and considering cloud first, but what the strategy recognizes is ensure the technology fits the mission that you are trying to serve," said Suzette Kent, the federal chief information officer, during a press briefing on Sept. 24 in Washington. "The cloud first strategy was actually released in 2010 and it was part of the 25-point implementation plan and reform federal IT. It was at a time when cloud was still new and many agencies were early in journey and adopting their technologies. We've learned a substantial amount within the federal government as well as the capabilities in industry have significantly advanced."
